An Ever Expanding Market- The global education market climbed past US$2.3 trillion in spending early this decade, and by 2005 education spending had grown to around US$2.5 trillion, Current Demand for higher education around the world is projected to expand from 97 million students in 2000 to 262 million students in 2025. The World Agency has estimates in April 2006 showed that the private higher education market approached US$400 billion worldwide. Private education is playing a critical role in advancing development of education, specifically higher education and lifelong learning, in many countries around the world.

The past two decades have seen the emergence of an international higher education market that is now developing faster than ever before. The number of players in this market is increasing too: public and private higher education institutions, education and testing companies, ministries of education, and quality assurance and accreditation agencies.

Demand & Supply mismatch - Robust growth of the economy has spelled numerous vacancies, severe shortage of the talented workforce and high demand of management professionals in the world today.
